

Figure 3.

Emerging radicle of newly germinated seedling of Pinus becoming incorporated into the mycelial network growing from and supported by the established central plant. Depending upon the levels of host specificity shown by the fungus in question such infection processes lead to incorporation, at intra or interspecific levels, of individual plants, into guilds which are interconnected by their mycorrhizal fungi.